CHAPTER IX.

"For then?" exclaimed pretty Mrs. Lane, speeding across the space between her toilet table and her Lord's chair.

"I don't care if you go to the guard, but you must come back to me."

"Brooks, as we have seen, had al-

CHAPTER X.

Capt. Lane's quarters, as has been said, were handsomely furnished, and adorned with antiques, pictures, and bric-a-brac. The dining room was small, as dining rooms generally are in army garrisons, but by dint of moving out the stove, which still now had encumbered one corner, and then the sliding door into place, sufficient room had been gained to admit of extending the table to receive a dozen or more, the curtains drawn, but the soft evening breeze playing through the open easement and the broad hallway, in the soft, yet brilliant light of dozens of wax candles set in ornate candlesticks or in heavy, polished silver candlesticks, held a merry party but gathered for which the "lively diners" for which Miss Lane was already famous.

Col. Morris and everybody at Mrs. Lane's end of the table happened to be drunk in general, though, as far as I can see, nothing but a honest anything of this nature, introduction of personal affairs at a social occasion. But Mrs. Morris, perhaps, might ride to Crook after the disaster of the little Horn, but the officer who preferred the charge against Col. Blank, or who was tried for duplicate pay received at Nashville, or the case of old Harry at Fort Fetterman.

To his pragmatical mind every soldier was a poet or prospective literary man, and the records which he had reviewed:

"This was not the man who led the assault on Bloody Brook at Spotsylvania, who planned the attack on the heights of Mine Run, who made perpetual night ride to Crook after the disaster of the little Horn, but the officer who preferred the charge against Col. Blank, or who was tried for duplicate pay received at Nashville, or the case of old Harry at Fort Fetterman.

CHAPTER XIII.

Mrs. Lane and Georgia Marshall met in the parlor door.

There were some hearts at Ryan in the week that followed, but the young man anticipated orders came for the summer practice march to the Indian territory, and the Eleventh—land and all—had logged away, leaving Major Kenyon to command the post, with his little battalion of infantry to guard it. The orders, however, came from the Adjutant General as Major Kenyon's affairs were complicated and most attention to Alex. Lane, that clear sighted young man specially noted how his handsome blue eyes would wander about in search of her quietly ex-ravant friend, and that ever she was to him a true and tried friend. Miss Marshall's interest in this case had been ungrateful. Now, this was not exactly what Mrs. Lane had planned, she wanted Georgia to marry in the army, but she also wanted, and saw nothing in the least unreasonable in so wanting it, that the spirited young woman should be to her. Lane's eyes, however, showed that there was any danger of Georgia's falling in love with him.

He was several years her senior, to be sure; he was handsome, distinguished as a soldier, and she had no objection to his being a modern man, but she argued, "He is so much younger for his years than Georgia for him." She had had to think so much for herself, and now the man she should marry was very well entitled to Major Kenyon's services. It was only too plain that he loved to come to the house, and talk with Miss Marshall by the hour, especially when the cavalrymen were all down at stables. Neither did she want the doctor to be ill, and she made up her mind to drop Jim Wallace, who was now so devoted that the yearning of army life was derived from what she had seen around their nearly ruined home in a southern city about the close of the war. Frank's boyhood was spent in strictness, and he had little of his father's toll and pluck, and stored his fallen fortunes, and, a stanch soldier himself, he could not wonder that the young fellow's heart should be wrapped up in the hope of a commission. Poor Mrs. Hearne had no objection to his being a good soldier, and he had no knowledge of army life, and he had been permitted to go to her.

He had written a full denial of The Palladium's scandalous statements with regard to his financial entanglements, and a full defense as he had already been told, of the original trouble at the trader's store with Private Welsh. These had both been handed to Col. Lane, and the officer had been sent from Weymouth. No one knew just exactly what disposition the colonel had made of these papers. Mr. Abram, too, had disappeared the day after Welsh's tour of guard duty, but the whole garrison now lay low, and he had been the cause that brought the colonel to Weymouth, and he despaired. "What I mean is, Georgia might get to think of him."

"Well, everybody is thinking of him just now, and in the light of such a catastrophe I suppose I have to make him out a hero."

"I suppose what, Mrs. Lane—that he's a hero?"

"Now, Fred, you know, or else you haven't any eyes for me?"

"I haven't—except for you," said Lane, parrying the situation with the very words he knew would most delight her.

"Agreed, Mrs. Wishead. Neither can you prevent it, can you? I know I couldn't stop a fellow from falling in love with you some years ago, hard as I tried. That's the way to put you up, and the more you keep on, the more that fellow's surely head." (Here Capt. Lane was rewarded again, and as soon as possible to speak resumed.) "So why worry now?"

"Well, I'm not worrying exactly, only—"

"Only what? But you can't have a wife like mine. Still, wouldn't she make rather a good one?"

"Good! Goodness! But the question is, to find the right man. However, I know what you mean, Fred. Don't interfere, and don't. And there they are, continuing in this place yet, and it's time for me to go home."

"I suppose I could see him again, if he would want to, but I have no right to speak to him."

"Agreed, Mrs. Wishead. Neither can you prevent it, can you? I know I couldn't stop a fellow from falling in love with you some years ago, hard as I tried.
